SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 2.

FRIGHTENED TO DEATH.—Professor Alverga, a teacher of French at a night school in Hartford, died on Thursday last from an attack of imaginary hydrophobia. Two weeks ago the professor was severely bitten about the hands and face by a strange dog while trying to eject the animal from his office. The dog was not supposed to be rabid at the time, but the professor began to receive notes from friends, acquaintances and strangers, some assuring him that hydrophobia was sure to follow his wounds, while others, assuming that to be a foregone conclusion, gave him directions how to proceed in curing himself.

These unwise letters led him to brood upon his condition, and he began a thorough course of reading upon the subject of hydrophobia. By inquiry from a prominent physician of Hartford he learned how long the disease took to manifest itself, and as the day approached for symptoms to appear he grew constantly more agitated, until he broke down completely. Among medical men in Hartford the case has awakened great interest, and a number of physicians visited the patient. He had been occasional spasms, and at times has been very violent. By great exertions a small quantity of beef tea and milk was forced down his throat, and at times small pieces of ice were kept in his mouth.
